of the Wanamaker firm, arrived from Philadelphia yesterday morning, and spent several hours in assessing several hours in arranging certain details for taking early possession of the property. "Our firm," said Mr. Ogden, "will enter upon the occupancy of the building at the earliest possible moment-almost immedi tirely new plan for the management of the store, based upon the same system of organization that has made the Philadelphia store of John Wanamaker famous. Preparations will be pushed with all possible dispatch. We cannot say now just when we shall have our new store in working order. It may be within thirty days, or perhaps not before sixty. We shall make every effort to catch the floor tide of business that sets in in the Autumn, and reaches high-tide before the holidays. We shall lose no time, but there is much to be done. We shall replenish the stock of the old firm with new stock of our own. The stock that we take over in the Broadway store we shall offer to purchasers at very low prices, simultaneously with the opening of the new store.

Hereafter it will be Wanamaker's!
The big white store which for years was Stewart's, and afterward until recently was knewn as Hilton, Hughes & Co.'s, has passed into the hands of the Philadelphia dry goods monarch.

The negotiation was consummated on Saturday evening. It had been pending for the past three weeks. Hardly had the news gone abroad of the assignment by Hilton, Hughes & Co., when offers began to pour in from all parts of the United States. Extraggle Honry Hilton, received visits from the representatives of prominent dry goods sestablishments in this city, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago and Cincimant.

on the broad fields opposite the Morris County Golf Club. Last Sunday he selected Con, who had not been out of the stables for several days, and found him in a refractory mood. A few turns across the fields under Mr. Nichols's hand, bowever, appeared to quiet the hunter. Mr. Nichols then decided to try him at a fence.

"Con's" reputation was that of a clean jumper. Mr. Nichols, therefore, did not hesitate to give bim a rather severe test. The road skirting the fields runs between two fences, about forty feet apart. These are ordinary four-bar fences, the first one being in good condition, but the other, having been broken, was repaired with a sec tion of picket fence, rather higher than the

On being put at the first fence "Con" answered promptly to his master's signal, rose, and cleared the obstacle gallantly. But the horse had hardly landed when the rider knew that there was to be trouble. 'Con" took the bit in his teeth and made straight for the second fence at the spot where it had been repaired with pickets. The distance between the two fences was so short that Mr. Nichols had no chance to regain control of the animal. It was also too short to enable "Con" to recover fully from his first jump before taking the second. Misjudging his distance, the animal rose too soon, rose high, and fell short, coming down with his chest full upon the point of one of the pickets, which p'erced through the breast bone into the parts of the stock were for higher prices that those that were offered for the property as a whole, but that the total receipts for the various features, if sold separately, might aggregate less than the definite sum offered by some of the bidders for the general property just as it stood when it passed into the hands of the assignee. Then the offers of those firms were taken up which proposed to take over the big store with all its contents and appurstenances. Thus John Wanamaker's bid was deemed the most satisfactory, and he was invited to a personal consultation with public office of trust for a period of four the legal representatives of Hilton, Hughes years.
